Summary

EPA received a number of requests to extend the 60-day comment period associated with the Bristol Bay Watershed Assessment and a number of requests that the agency not extend the comment period. Having considered all the requests, EPA has made a decision not to extend the 60-day comment period.

EPA intends to announce its decision on Thursday July 5th with concurrent outreach to requesters and stakeholders explaining the decision.

Our response to the media will be to give inquiring reporters the desk statement and share a copy of the generic letter if asked.

Q&A

Why did EPA decide not to extend the comment period?

EPA provided a 60-day comment period for the review of this assessment, and that is consistent with review periods the agency has provided for similarly important scientific reports. This is a scientific assessment—not a regulatory action. Thus, there is no required public comment period.

In addition, a 60-day comment period is more time than is typically provided by the state and the U.S. Army Corps of Engineers for actual permits that would impact the environment.

If EPA were to initiate regulatory actions with regard to Bristol Bay, there would be a comprehensive public engagement process and comment period.

Some tribal corporations say EPA has not met with them nor given them sufficient time to comment. Is that true?

EPA made outreach to tribes, tribal corporations and Bristol Bay residents a priority from day one of the assessment. EPA officials and staff have made over 24 visits to 12 villages since initiating the assessment. Top EPA officials have met with tribes and tribal corporations. These officials include the EPA Administrator's deputy administrator, general counsel, associate administrator for water and EPA regional administrator.

EPA has met with representatives of 17 villages and nine tribal corporations. In some cases, EPA met numerous times with the same tribal corporations and representatives, and we continue to welcome meetings and discussion. Tribal corporations also attended and commented during our recent public meetings in Alaska and Seattle.

A 60-day comment period is consistent with EPA's previous experience for similarly important scientific reports and is in fact longer than the comment periods typically provided by the state and the U.S. Army Corps of Engineers for permits that would actually impact the environment.

There are complaints that the comment period is at an inconvenient time due to fishing season. How do you justify not extending it past the fishing season?

EPA heard from tribes and stakeholders who asked us to extend the comment period and other tribes and stakeholders who asked us to maintain the original 60-day comment period. Many requests to keep the 60-day comment period came from tribes and stakeholders who work in the Bristol Bay fishery.

We carefully weighed the input with regard to the fishing season and concluded that the original comment period gave sufficient time to comment given the fishing season.

EPA's public meetings in June were well-attended by over 2,000 people, including many who practice a subsistence way of life and many in the commercial fishing industry. To date, almost 800 individual letters and 13,000 form letters have been submitted to the public comment docket.

What happens next?

The comment period ends on July 23. At that time, EPA will consolidate the comments and give them to the scientific peer review panel for consideration. The panel will use these public comments as it considers the assessment. This panel will meet August 7-9 in Anchorage, and there will be an opportunity for the public to directly address the panel and provide information that would expand scientific knowledge of Bristol Bay.
